DJ Music Blog Expands, More Content and Podcast TwilightFrequencies.com Expands Staff, Content and Gets Facelift

Dj music blog Twilight Frequencies (<http://www.twilightfrequencies.com>) has expanded to include a larger scope of content, a monthly podcast, and a new design. The blog, created and maintained by electronic music producer BlakeAndrew, has added a new contributor to include a wider range of music coverage and even film.

The new contributor, Ryan Boos, is the sole member of the psychedelic-pop band The Nomadic Firs and was brought on to help expand the capacity of the music blog with his wide musical palette and unique flavor. New contributions to the blog will focus on indie music reviews, indie films, and the latest from up-and-coming artists.

Twilight Frequencies has also started a free music podcast that is going strong. The monthly podcast is arranged and mixed by a different independent artist or dj each monthly episode. The free podcast was started to help expose unknown or underrated artists and djs; while also peppering the podcast with more well known talent from across the globe. Twilight Frequencies is open to all styles of music for the podcast - as wide as the daily content on the dj music blog - techno and house, to indie and folk, to ambient and dubstep: though a majority of the podcasts have steered toward djs mixing upbeat electronic music. Keep your eyes out for podcasts including original music from Twilight Frequencies independent artists and djs too, these guys have some interesting and fresh material coming out themselves.

The expansion of the dj music blog initiated revitalization of the blog design. In addition to a being a electronic music producer and techno dj, BlakeAndrew is also a graphic and web designer and he has designed a fresh new look for the blog which continues the mysterious, celestial design, yet adds more usability and functionality for the readers. For this version of design the blog has a much lighter background, new fonts and a cleaner look; making it easier to read and explore the site. The blog has come a long way so far and it seems will continue to expand and grow with its audience.

TwilightFrequencies.com is dj music blog and online resource for the most up to date, compelling electronic and organic music news, music reviews, technology in the music industry, music production software and gear, music artist interviews, music videos, music production tips, tricks and tutorials, and all around music culture.

BlakeAndrew is an electronic music producer and techno dj. His passion for electronic music began in the mid 90's with a heavy influence of industrial, metal and rap. He was captivated mainly by the heavy bass, beats, and energy. Once techno was found he felt his musical search was over – his first set of Technics was purchased and the vinyl collection began. Growing up in Michigan BlakeAndrew spent every weekend in Detroit trying to capture all the sounds and culture of the techno capital. His techno interests moved beyond the shores of the United States and into electronic music that was emerging out of Europe. Naturally, because of his hard-style music background, he was drawn to dark, hard techno. After djing techno and slammin' breaks regionally throughout the Midwest he focused solely on music production. BlakeAndrew has now found a balance between production, djing, and communication through his music and the Twilight Frequencies dj music blog and podcast.
